In the former parlor and kitchen of the Steere house, the windows and their paneled aprons are framed by elaborate architraves with elliptical moldings and bull's-eye corner blocks. The doorways are treated in a similar fashion. The original single-flight stairway, which is also well-preserved, has a rounded rail and columnar newels of a dark wood with a natural finish, and slender square balusters. The riser ends are decorated with bracket-like scrollwork. The baseboard in these rooms and on the stair is capped with a simple cyma recta molding.

The five fireplaces on the first floor have elaborate Colonial Revival mantels with monochrome tile surrounds and hearths, as well as cast-iron fire boxes, which were installed c. 1896 by "Shang" Bailey. The eastern stairway, which is also a single flight, has an ogee-molded rail, massive turned newels and spindle balusters. The other woodwork in the eastern section includes a prominently molded chair rail in the northeast and southeast rooms, more severely molded window frames and plain baseboards, all of which seem to date from 1833.

While the plan of the second floor has been considerably altered in the western section, the layout of the rooms in the eastern half appears to be little changed. The latter rooms also retain their original trim, including chair rails in all four rooms, but all of the fireplaces have been covered up.

The garret, which has plastered walls and ceilings, is divided into one large and two small rooms. There is little evidence of any change in these rooms since the nineteenth century, except for the heating ducts installed in 1976.

The cellar, under the 1833 addition, has rubblestone masonry walls and two chimney supports. It contains the furnace and other utilities.

In the 1976 rehabilitation, a new heating system was installed with metal registers set in the floors and hot-air ducts built onto the walls on the first and second stories. New floors of carpet-covered plywood were also laid at this time, except in the former parlor, kitchen and the hall of the western section where the original wide pine planks survive, and in the northeast and southeast rooms on the first story, where there are hardwood floors from c. 1896.

There is a single-story, gable-roofed rear wing with an internal chimney, attached to and presumably coeval with the 1833 addition. The wing was converted into a separate apartment sometime in the twentieth century and it has been adapted for use as storerooms with few changes, except the removal of a side door on the east side.

A large, two-story gable-roofed wing was built onto the western half of the house's north wall in 1976. This wing, which contains a showroom on the first story and a storeroom on the second, has vertical board siding and six-over-six, double-hung sash windows with louvered shutters. New double doorways were made in the rear wall of the house, on the first and second floors, to provide internal access to this wing.

Historic photographs of the house made in the late nineteenth century show the house surrounded by lawn, with a semi-elliptical driveway in front, a side driveway on the east and outbuildings to the north. Since 1976, the lawn on the west has been replaced with a paved parking lot; the semi-elliptical driveway disappeared with the widening of the Hartford Pike and the outbuildings have fallen down or been removed. A strip of grass with a large shade tree still stretches between the east side of the house and the side driveway.

Stephen Randall's son, Henry, sold the business to Frederick "Shang" Bailey in 1896 for a mere $100. Shang Bailey (1842-1913), a native of Burrillville, Rhode Island, was a colorful character who once starred in P.T. Barnum's circus as the "Shanghai Giant" (Bailey was 6'7" tall).

Bailey's steps to revitalize the tavern's sagging business included transforming it into a bordello/gambling house. In addition, he paid corrupt police officials $120.00 a year in order to sell liquor on Sunday. He also installed slot machines and provided entertainment for his patrons. In 1902 a trolley line was laid out along Hartford Pike between Providence and North Scituate, thereby making the roadhouse easily accessible to Providence patrons. Bailey's Roadhouse soon became well-known throughout southeast New England.

However, on February 27, 1905, Bailey experienced a sudden religious conversion. He immediately proceeded to empty his whole stock of liquor into the road, smashed his slot machines with an axe, and permanently closed his tavern. Thereafter, he held Sunday services in the building and became a well-known Christian evangelist. Oral history relates that his wife, Bella, though initially pleased at the change in her husband, soon had cause for regret as he depleted their savings by repaying everyone he had swindled--including the U.S. Government for $2,000 in undeserved disability pension payments.

Bailey began selling off portions of the property in 1906. After his death, the old tavern was converted for multi-family occupancy and passed through a number of ownerships until 1976, when it was remodeled into a gift shop by the present owners.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Cornell-Randall-Bailey Roadhouse is significant to the history of architecture as a fairly well-preserved example of a commercial structure that served the needs of the turnpike traffic in the nineteenth century, and offered social-amusement activities to trolley traffic at the turn of the century. While such transportation related structures were common, they were never very numerous, and increasing development pressure, particularly twentieth-century road improvements, has resulted in the alteration or removal of many. Although the Cornell-Randall-Bailey Roadhouse has been altered in 1833, c. 1896, and 1976, it retains significant exterior and interior fabric as well as integrity of setting.

Historical Background

The Cornell-Randall-Bailey Roadhouse is located on the north side of heavily travelled Route 6-Hartford Pike in the western end of Johnston. Land records indicate that the present .95 acre property was once part of a 120 acre tract of land sold by Charles Comstock to Samuel Steere in 1798. Shortly afterwards, Steere erected a modest two and one-half-story frame dwelling, that, with subsequent enlargements, exists today. The country road running by the farm house was widened and improved in 1804-05 as the Rhode Island and Connecticut Turnpike.

After Samuel's death in 1826, his son, Hardin, acquired the property. He sold the farm in 1833 to Daniel and Amy Cornell of Glocester, Rhode Island for $4,000. Cornell proceeded to enlarge the house to its present 21-room size and converted it into a tavern. "Cornell's Tavern Stand" became a popular stagecoach stop and rooming house, serving the Turnpike and local traffic. At that time, the Providence and Hartford stages passed three times a day. After Cornell's death in 1847, his heirs sold the business to Henry and Margaret Angell for $4,000.

To purchase the property, Angell received a mortgage from the heirs. He hoped to attract more business by constructing a "bowling saloon" on the property. However, upon failing to pay a $500 promissory note, Angell was legally bound to sell the property at public auction in 1850. The successful bidder, Seril Cornell, sold the property to Stephen Randall the following year.

By the third quarter of the 19th century, the turnpike traffic had considerably diminished due to the establishment of the railroads, and in 1871 the Turnpike was made a free road by an Act of the General Assembly.
