DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

In 1816 a contract was made by the town of Bristol to have constructed a new court house, this to be of stone laid in mortar and faced with brick. It was so built, with dressed stone quoins, lintels and other trim, though now the brick walls are covered with stucco and the stone trim is painted a pink-tan.

In its central portion the building is a gabled one (the ridge running east and west), three bays wide and of three storeys--the third storey of much diminished height; its main entrance is on the west. The building, however, extends to north and south in two two-storey portions (appearing like wings but not actually being such), each of which carries a hipped roof halved and terminated against the sides of the higher gabled centre section. Surmounting this centre section is a square wooden tower of two stages, each railed, supporting an octagonal belfry or cupola with arched, louvred openings and a concave conical, or pagoda-type, roof.

The building may have been designed by Russell Warren, who worked much in Bristol, and it is a modest example of the Federal period. It has not suffered from exterior alteration except for the stucco, which is scarcely disfiguring. The main entrance, apparently originally unsheltered, now has a shallow wooden porch added within recent years which in fact enhances the building; it is (by Wallis Howe) of sympathetic and carefully considered design. This porch occurs beneath the main original decorative feature of the west façade, a large, modestly rusticated arched window opening subdivided by wooden colonettes and interlaced "Gothick" mullions. Louvred window shutters or blinds are hung outside the other windows. Perhaps there were such blinds originally, but the present ones are obviously modern replacements of thin mill-work and, moreover, are hung inside-out. The building's exterior is well maintained and has a crisp, clean appearance.

Internally, the building is intact except for minor changes required for convenience or for official procedure as, for example, in 1836, when the ground floor was used for town offices, and in 1870, when the judges' bench was shifted from one side of the court to the other, causing a fireplace to be closed. The west entrance leads into a vestibule and large hall which open to offices at the rear and sides of the ground floor. Two staircases at the front corners of the hall lead to the courtroom occupying, unobstructed, the entire second floor. The ceiling of this large room is supported only at the sides within the room, but is otherwise held up by a trusswork of heavy beams in the attic. The "third storey" of the centre portion of the court house contains only that trusswork, and no rooms, in spite of its windows. The interior of the building has always been notably lacking in forms of adornment, having only the simplest of mouldings in necessary places.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

This is one of the five court houses or "state houses" in which, up to 1855, the General Assembly of Rhode Island met in prescribed rotation. The Assembly first met in Bristol in 1785, thus asserting that town's importance as a county centre (the area had been annexed from Massachusetts in 1747). Though not really large and not known to have been a background for great legislative or judicial events, personalities or decisions, the court house was evidently from the beginning intended to provide Bristol with a public building of some visual importance and the legislature and judiciary with dignified accommodations.

It remains a part of the state's history and of Bristol's, as well as being a fine example of Federal architecture and an adornment to the town common.
