At the head of Fort Neck Pond—an arm of Ninigret Pond on the southern coast of the state—stand the remains of a small earthwork fortwhich was probably built by Dutch traders in the first half of the seventeenth century. The fort, high on a cliff just above the water's edge, is basically square: approximately 170 feet by 150 feet, with hexagonal bastions approximately 20 feet across at all but the southwest corners. The fort's shape is defined by a continuous low embankment of earth and stone rubble, with a slight trench bordering it along the outer edge. The walls were originally stone but have long since been torn down for building material.

Originally thought to have been an Indian fort, the three-quarters-of-an-acre site was dedicated as a memorial to the Niantic and Narra-gansett tribes on August 30, 1883, and named "Fort Ninigret" in honor of the great Niantic sachem. The original outlines are now protected by an iron railing, and an engraved boulder marks the center of the fort's location. Since 1883 the site has been maintained as a park by the state.

It is believed that Fort Ninigret was originally a Dutch trading post established in the first half of the seventeenth century. As such, it is evidence of early exploration along Long Island Sound and of early military engineering in America. The Dutch West India Company, formed in 1621, built its first fort in Connecticut in 1633, and the erection of Fort Ninigret must date from soon thereafter. These forts were small in scale and were used aproutposts for trading with the Indians.

Tradition suggests that the fort was later held by the Niantic Indians. This tribe had been driven from Connecticut by the Pequots and under their chief, Ninigret, had found refuge among the Narragansetts.

In 1737 the General Court of Connecticut declared war on the belligerent Pequots. Late in May of that year Captain John Mason, with a force of ninety men, sailed into Narragansett Bay. Reinforced by about one hundred Narragansetts, Mason's group marched along the shore, headed for the Pequot fort at Mystic, Connecticut.

Upon reaching Fort Ninigret they were met with open hostility. Many Niantic braves had married Pequot squaws, and tribal sympathies were distinctly against white men. After two days of talk, Mason continued on his way, with neither help nor hindrance from the Niantics. On June 7 he surrounded and destroyed the Pequot fort, thus saving the English settlement in Connecticut.

Because of this legendary connection with the Niantics, the remains of Fort Ninigret were made a memorial to that tribe in 1883.
