DESCRIBE THE P	RESENT AND OBL	GINAL (// known) R

The Philip Walker house, located near the Seekonk River in the village of Rumford in East Providence (originally part of Rehoboth, Massachusetts), stands on a former expanse of farmland. The oldest (1679) house in the area, it is presently a two-and-one-half-storey, gableroofed, shingled structure with two large brick chimneys--one internal and the other at the south end. There is a nineteenth-century small entry porch on the east, or main, front; and an old one-storey, gableroofed ell at the south end was converted into an open porch about 1900. At about the same time a one-storey, gable-roofed ell was built on the north end to house a new kitchen. About 1750 the seventeenth-century main house was lengthened to the south by extending the gable roof and adding four rooms, two on the ground floor and two above, with a brick chimney of triangular plan set between them.

The original (northern) part of the house is still clearly identifiable. It is heavily framed throughout, with exposed plates, girts and summer beams (all now cased, this probably done when the house was enlarged) and is nearly square--about 28 by 28 feet. Originally clapboarded, its was built around a very large plain-topped off-center brick chimney on a somewhat atypical three-room scheme (see plan). In this plan the main entrance, located in the south (left) Front bay, does not face the chimney but--as originally designed--let directly into the keeping-room opposite the staircase, which was built against the south wall of that room. This staircase, built in one long run with a short turn at the top, has a wide-boarded closed string sourse, some seventeenthcentury vertical beaded and bevelled sheathing below, plain square posts and a handrail molded on the outer face only. The present flat "S"shaped balusters were made by the present owner's father about sixty years ago, but he followed the original pattern. Except for a small room just south (left) of the staircase wall, the keeping-room originally extended across the entire east front. The room has long since been divided by a wide vertical-boarded partition along the old summer beam to separate the present hallway from the keeping-room-kitchen, which became releated to the northern half of the former large room. Here the large cooking fireplace -- with its brick hearth and a beehive oven, closed by a two-panel door, at its right-side front--extends from the summer beam and partition wall nearly across the west side of the room. It has retained its original lintel, and some seventeenth-century beaded and bevelled vertical sheathing finishes the remainder of the wall. The original plastered ceiling has been removed to expose the old floor joists above.

The rear (or west side) of the original house consisted of a large living-room at its southern end and in the northwest corner a small room tucked in behind the chimney, each with its own fireplace. In the back living-room the heavy framing beams, including the summer heam, all now have casings of c. 1750 and run moldings applied at the cornice level; they are the most conspicuous features of the room. A simple one-storey mantel of c. 1800 frames the fireplace opening.

7. Description.

The two ground-storey rooms added on the south in 1750 or thereabouts consist of a dining-room and a "back parlor;" this latter room is treated as an extension of the back living-room in the early part of the house. In each of these added rooms a handsome, wide mantel-breast is set across the room corner; each room is panelled from floor to ceiling, with a typical (for 1750 work) bolection molding framings its fireplace opening and run moldings forming the ceiling cornice. The treatment above the diningroom mantel, now darkened with age, consists of a narrow and a wide horizontal nanels above the fireplace; that above the back room fireplace has cupboards with panelled doors closing upon old book hinges. The small room south of the staircase in the original part of the house has been converted into a closet for the dining-room.

Upstairs, the two new chambers are without special detail, but the second storey of the original house has several interesting features. Noteworthy is the unusually large, and evidently original, upper stair-hall which conforms to the entry plan downstairs as it was later altered. A batten door with strap hinges leads into the northeast corner chamber, above the kitchen. This room has an extraordinary mixture of seventeenthcentury vertical sheathing with wide bevels and unusual (probably homemade) groovings, combined with a provincial version of stile-and-rail manelling that repeats the detail of the sheathing. The stairs to the garret, formerly located between the chimney and the western wall of the above-kitchen chamber, have been removed to allow space for a hathroom. At the rear, the above-living-room chamber, like its counterpart below, has heavy exposed and cased beams. The mantelpiece in this room probably dates from 1750, when the house was enlarged. It is embellished with very colloquiallyhandled pilasters that frame the mantel panels and come to a baseless stop above the molding for the fireplace opening. Two-panel doors are used in . this room.

In general, throughout the house are to be found several door types, including batten and four-panel ones as well as the above-mentioned twopanel doors; and much of the hardware--which includes strap, several versions of H-L, H and book hinges, various types of bean or pointed latches and box locks--is original. Most of the old wide-board flooring is in place. Except for the kitchen, where the joists were exposed later, walls and ceilings are plastered.

Philip Walker's first house was burned in the Indian War of the mid-1670's that devasted all the buildings in its area. In 1678-1679 Walker rebuilt his house on the old foundation. Although his "new" house does not conform to the Rhode Island stone-end houses considered typical for this period, its plan--in which an entry-cum-stair-hall is lacking and the three main rooms are swung around an off-center chimney-is an interesting one and akin to the Christopher and Job Townsend houses in Newport. The original framing, with its heavy summer beams, girts, plates and corner posts, is still intact and--together with some seventeenth-century sheathing and the staircase--can be studied profitably. The 1750 addition at the southern end and the general refurbishing that took place at that time furnish excellent examples of mid-eighteenthcentury finish.

Walker himself was a prominent local figure. In the words of Richard LeBaron Bowen he was a "farmer, weaver, swamill proprietor, deacon of the church, constable, and incidentally the second richest man in Rehoboth." He was also the chronicler in verse of the bloody battles of King Philip's War; and again, according to Bowen, his house is "the oldest poet's house in New England [while] few houses are so inquestionably dated." With a small amount of careful restoration the inherent architectural importance of the Philip Walker house can be made more evident. Its local historical importance has long been recognized.
