Richmond Town House Richmond Town House Road Richmond, Rhode Island Code: 44

7. Description cont.

Southeast of this node of business buildings, rows of simple Greek Revival cottages flank both sides of Route 138. The best preserved Greek Revival house on the Richmond side, the D. Kenyon House (#40), stands on routes 138 and 3 at the western end of the district. This l_2^2 story cottage is enhanced by a "carpenter gothic" trellis, interesting outbuildings, and a picket fence which differentiates between the public space of the road and the private yard surrounding the house.

Buildings in the Wyoming Village Historic District are generally in good condition and fairly well preserved.

Inventory

Numbers are taken from the site plan names of buildings are taken from 1855, the 1870 and the 1895 maps.

trim. Only the Segar Store (#46) and the Palmer-Segar House present more elaborate interpretations of the Greek Revival. Two other architecturally ambitious buildings are the bracketed Pierce-Cook House (#47, c.1865) and the bracketed house on Bridge Street owned by the mill company in 1870 (#24).

Seventy per cent of the buildings and historic sites in Wyoming date from the most important era in its development: c.1815-c.1870. Only nine structures may be considered extraneous to the historic and architectural fabric of the village. The physical characteristics of Wyoming reveal its history -- its site on the river dictated by the availability of water power, the development of the commercial area on the main traffic artery, the location of the tavern and livery stable at the junction of two important highways, the preponderance of mid-nineteenth century buildings reflecting the fact that this was the era of Wyoming's greatest prosperity. STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Wyoming developed as an industrial village, a turnpike waystop, and a commercial center. In the late eighteenth century what is now Wyoming was the farm of Samuel Brand. Brand was not solely a farmer, however. He dammed the river, established an iron works on the Hopkinton shore, and began the settlement first known as "Brand's Iron Works." How the name was changed to "Wyoming" is not clear, but how Brand's fledgling village became a thriving community is well documented.

In 1814, Nathan Lillibridge, in partnership with Exekiel, Stephen, Samuel and Nathan Tefft, built the Brothers' Cotton Mill opposite Brand's establishment. The following year the New London Turnpike, part of the principal overland route from Boston to New York, was opened. It passed directly through the village and is now Route 3. The turnpike improved transportation to and from the Wyoming factories and thus aided their business. More significantly, it brought stage coaches, mail riders and individual travelers to the village and the tavern (#32) enjoyed a lucrative trade. First operated by Francis Brown, Samuel Brand's sonin-law, the tavern's most famous proprietor was A. J. Dawley who kept the house for forty-five years in the mid-nineteenth century. Ownership of the livery stable (#48) was a natural outgrowth of Dawley's enterprise.

In the late 1830's the iron works was displaced by a second cotton mill. When the mill burned in 1844, the site was taken over by J. T. Sheldon, who erected a new textile mill and continued in business through the late 1870's. His mill was probably the most successful industrial venture at Wyoming and his prosperity, and the work available in his mill, prompted the development of "Prospect Square."

Wyoming's first store was opened in 1837. By 1870 there were three general stores in the village, two blacksmith shops, a hardware store, tailor, paint shop, druggist, photographer's studio, furniture store, and a bank. Wyoming's "downtown" was the primary commercial district for an extensive area.

Today the mills are gone and business has almost ceased in the village of Wyoming. Only a gas station, an insurance office and a barroom hint of the once extensive commercial activity. A late twentieth century turnpike-oriented business district has grown up half a mile southeast
