DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Erected c. 1790, this three-story, five-bay-wide, clapboarded house was built by Joseph Rogers, a Newport merchant. Set upon a stone foundation, the hipped-roof house abuts the sidewalk of Touro Street and faces Washington Square to the north. Twelve-over-twelve-pane double-hung sash windows light the first and second stories, while the typically shorter window openings of the third floor have eight-over-eight-pane sash; these third-floor windows are set just below the main cornice (all of the now-correct types of window sash are restorations by the present owner). The beautifully carved central doorway, however, is original. It was inspired by such architectural handbooks as those of James and William Pain. The six-panel door (also a restoration by the present owner) is contained between applied, fluted half-columns of the composite order which support a pediment, with dentils, into which the door's surmounting leaded fanlight arises.

Basically square in plan, with chimneys in the internal walls, the house was originally composed of two rooms on either side of front and rear halls occupying its center. The lower front hall has retained its dentilled cornice and the simple stairway which rises along its side in two runs. The rail, taking a half-turn at its start, is supported by balusters of simple form and has turned newels. The secondary stair in the rear hall backs up against the main stairway. The chimneys have been removed, and the rooms, throughout, have been stripped of their trim. Some of the rooms have been altered in size and now accommodate offices. A shallow, two-story ell, part of it capped by a gable roof, attaches at the rear.

The Rogers house remained in private residential use until the 1890's, when it was turned into a convent. By 1907 it had been adapted to new use as a parochial high school, and by then or before had lost its inner trim and had had certain exterior features of "Queen Anne" style--lately removed--applied. Having outlived adequacy and safety as a school building, the house was within quite recent years presented to The Preservation Society of Newport County by the Bishop of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Providence.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Now maintained by The Preservation Society of Newport County as its headquarters, the Rogers house is characteristic of the many large and elegant houses which once lined Washington Square. Its doorway is an extremely beautiful example of Federal-period design. As one of the few remaining eighteenth-century residences on that square, it helps provide a suitable visual and historical accompaniment to Richard Munday's Colony House (1739) and Peter Harrison's Brick Market (1761), at the head and foot of the square respectively, as well as a handsome neighbor to the home of Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry (built before 1757) next-door.
